Regional development reimagined: territories as drivers of global transitions

Territorial dynamics today are being profoundly transformed by multiple transitions—ecological, economic, social, and industrial—that are redefining the roles and responsibilities of territories in a changing world. This special session highlights innovative work that explores how territories are responding to these complex challenges, integrating the dimensions of sustainability, resilience, and equity.

Global transitions, heightened by climate change, the reconfiguration of global value chains, and the imperatives of sustainable reindustrialization, call for a re-evaluation of regional development strategies. We therefore encourage contributions that examine the role of territories as drivers of transformation and cohesion in this unprecedented context. Proposals may focus on:

- Territorial strategies in the face of climate challenges, including mitigation and adaptation policies
- The reconfiguration of local economic systems within a framework of decarbonized and sustainable reindustrialization
- The impact of globalization and relocalization processes on regional balances
- Social and institutional innovations promoting ecological transition and territorial equity
- Analysis of the impact of place-based policies
